Concerto for Violin and Cello in A minor, Op. 102 ("Double Concerto")

Johannes Brahms (1833-1897)

Brahms' Double Concerto was his final work for orchestra, completed in the summer of 1887. Unusual in form, it features not one soloist but two—the violin and cello—engaged in intimate partnership, often exchanging lyrical phrases or blending into a single voice. The work was composed as a gesture of reconciliation toward his old friend, violinist Joseph Joachim, after a personal rift had separated them. By writing a concerto that Joachim could share with the cellist Robert Hausmann, Brahms offered not only a musical gift but also a personal olive branch.

The concerto opens with an arresting orchestral statement, followed by the cello's noble recitative-like entrance. The violin soon joins, and the two soloists launch into a dramatic dialogue. Throughout the first movement (Allegro), one hears Brahms' mature style—weighty, intricate, yet full of warmth.

The slow movement (Andante) offers the heart of the concerto: a broad, songful duet between violin and cello that floats gently above the orchestra. Here Brahms achieves a chamber-like intimacy, as if inviting the audience to overhear a private musical conversation.

The finale (Vivace non troppo) is spirited and genial, infused with Hungarian dance rhythms that recall the composer's lifelong love of folk-inspired music. After moments of brilliance and play, the concerto closes with warmth rather than thunder, a fitting farewell to Brahms' orchestral voice.

Vieille prière bouddhique: Prière quotidienne pour tout l'Univers

Lili Boulanger (1893-1918)

The French composer Lili Boulanger. . . ranks alongside her sister, the conductor and teacher Nadia Boulanger, among the most significant female figures in the history of music." (Konstantin Galluhn, 2010/Translation: Bradford Robinson).

While studying in Rome in 1914 at the age of 21, Lili Boulanger began working on setting this excerpt from an ancient Buddhist text, which emphasizes loving kindness toward all creatures. When World War I broke out, she returned to France to help with war-time needs, alongside her sister, Nadia, and the work's completion was delayed until 1917 and premiered in 1921.

Boulanger breaks up the text into four stanzas, each followed by the refrain, “without enemies, without obstacles, overcoming pain and attaining happiness, be able to move freely, each one in the path destined for them.”

TEXT AND TRANSLATION

	French translation by Suzanne Karpelès	English Translation
I:	Que toute chose qui respire	Let everything that breathes
II:	-- que toutes les créatures et partout	-- let all creatures everywhere,
	Tous les esprits et tous ceux qui sont nés	all the spirits and all those who are born,
III:	Que toutes les femmes, que tous les hommes	all the women, all the men,
	Les Aryens, et les non-Aryens	Aryans and non-Aryans,
	Tous les dieux et tous les humains	all the gods and all the people,
	Et ceux qui sont déchus	and those who have fallen,
IV:	En orient et en Occident, au Nord et au Sud	in the East and in the West, in the North and the South,
	Que tous les êtres qui existent --	Let all beings which exist --
	Sans ennemis, sans obstacles, surmontant la douleur	without enemies, without obstacles, overcoming pain
	Et atteignant le bonheur, puisse se mouvoir librement	and attaining happiness, be able to move freely,
	Chacun dans la voie qui lui est destinée	each one in the path destined for them.

* “ ‘Abode of the Aryans’ is a name for Northern India in classical Sanskrit literature. The Manu Smriti (2.22) gives the name to ‘the tract between the Himalaya and the Vindhya ranges, from the eastern to the western sea.’” (Tibetan Buddhist Encyclopedia)

Both the early Church of Rome and the Buddhist tradition are called to mind by the chant-like style of the thematic construction. This is supported by the use of modal scales, with particular emphasis on the Phrygian mode. The choices made within the French Impressionistic color palette for the orchestra include the ethereal nature of two harps and celeste, a flute solo reminiscent of Debussy's Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun (1894), and the darker resonances of the English horn, bass clarinet, sarrusophone (played here using a contra-bassoon), along with four trombones and tuba. The lushness of the orchestral writing paired with the voices, sometimes singing angelically in repeated melodic intervals without words, work hand-in-hand to create a very emotional musical experience that enhances the spiritual nature and meaning of the text itself.

Symphonic Metamorphosis on Themes of Carl Maria von Weber

Paul Hindemith (1895-1963)

Symphonic Metamorphosis on Themes of Carl Maria von Weber began life in early 1940, when Hindemith first took up residence in the United States after several years of public and private jousting with the Nazi government of his native Germany. The Nazis officially decried his music as "degenerate," though they may also have been responding to his private, but hardly secret, expressions of revulsion regarding their policies.

Hindemith sketched a series of movements based on themes by Weber, to be used in a ballet for a dance company run by Léonide Massine, who had already collaborated with Hindemith on the ballet Nobilissima visione. The project died when Hindemith and Massine suffered one too many artistic differences, provoking Hindemith to reconstruct the music into the Symphonic Metamorphosis on Themes of Carl Maria von Weber.

The process produced a splashy, colorful orchestral piece of the kind that American audiences in particular seemed to like. The new piece was an immediate success when it was premiered by Artur Rodzinski and the New York Philharmonic in January 1944. Symphonic Metamorphosis on Themes of Carl Maria von Weber has remained perhaps Hindemith's most popular work.

The themes Hindemith used are from some of Weber's most obscure works, and came to Hindemith's attention because they could all be found in one volume of piano duets that he owned. Hindemith not only retained all but one of the themes almost exactly as Weber wrote them but also preserved much of the formal structure of the pieces as well, so that it is possible to follow the general outlines of Hindemith's score while listening to Weber's music, or vice versa, and have a pretty good idea of what's going on. Hindemith alters nearly everything else, making radical changes to the harmony and adding to the music both vertically (with different harmonies and new countermelodies) and horizontally (extending phrases or entire sections).

Symphonic Metamorphosis showcases Hindemith's unique compositional language with its virtuosic woodwind runs, inventive contrapuntal schemes, and prevalent use of perfect fourths. The work begins with a machine-like ostinato, which precedes the introduction of the main theme in the upper woodwinds. Much of the first movement alternates between triumphant brass fanfares and contrapuntal writing for small groups of woodwind instruments, culminating with a bright and climactic A Major chord.

The second movement is based on themes introduced by the flute, clarinet, and piccolo in its opening call and response. After a brief percussion episode, the main theme passes between sections in seven complete statements. The composer's contrapuntal artistry is put on full display as a second theme is introduced and developed into two fugues — the first ferociously scored for brass, the second a toccata for woodwinds. A second percussion episode leads to an abbreviated recapitulation in which the original theme is presented in a truncated form, again, seven times before resolving with in a serene F Major chord.

Movement three begins with song-like woodwind solos accompanied by colorful, occasionally bird-like, ensemble interjections. The music intensifies through the addition of new instruments and denser harmonies leading to a reintroduction of the opening material enhanced by a virtuosic flute obbligato.

The “March” begins with trumpets and trombones playing a four-note declamatory fanfare based upon the interval of a perfect fourth. Hindemith develops the opening motive into the main theme of the movement, heard first in the woodwinds. In the trio, the horns introduce a second, more heroic theme. The two themes alternate throughout the movement, and the four-note fanfare returns to bring the work to a thrilling conclusion.
